

HR

WSD Personnel
Washington State
Employee
Assistance Program

FrontLineSupervisor

Olympia 360.753.3260

A newsletter from the Employee Assistance Program

Seattle 206.281.6315

Spokane 509.482.3686

Toll Free 877.313.4455

February 2008

<http://www.dop.wa.gov/eap>

■ I want to hire employees with good skills, but passion is something I value even more. How do I spot passion in a potential new hire?

If employers could hang a sign outside their workplaces that said, "Passion Wanted, Inquire Within" and make it work, they'd do it. Passion is the engine of highly productive employees. These employees can learn to accomplish almost anything. They're drivers. You can ask employees to talk about products or services of your company, and you can see their enthusiasm. However, passion is evidenced by behaviors, outcomes, and productivity. It comes later—or doesn't come at all. If you are personally passionate about your work, you will guess which employees are likely to be passionate also. This is because their values match your own. Spend time exploring work values during interviews, and discuss your agency's values or services along with their meaning to the employee. Does the employee see his or her life's purpose as a chosen occupation, and is that aligned with the mission and goals of your organization? There is a saying: "You can buy merit, but you can't buy passion." Follow the suggestion above, and you may come pretty close.

■ My employee tends to be stubborn and unable to see others' points of view. She is too blunt. For example, she'll say, "You're wrong!" rather than "I believe that..." She talks down to others. I've corrected her, but changes don't last. I think she is insecure. Would counseling help?

Your employee has a habit of communicating with others that is difficult to change, but it's doable. There could be many reasons for her communication style. Your focus should be on correcting the unacceptable job performance behavior and not guessing its cause. You need more leverage than simply fussing at her in return for short-term corrections. Consider holding her accountable by incorporating change in her performance reviews. Meet several times during the year to reinforce progress. Using this planned approach is important. Other leverage may include a corrective letter to address specific behaviors and provide motivation for change. A supervisor referral to the EAP is also appropriate. The EA Professional can explore underlying factors with your employee as well as offering helpful suggestions and appropriate referrals that may motivate your employee to make lasting behavioral changes.

■ We have a diverse workforce, and there is tension among some groups of employees that I think is race-based. I dealt swiftly with an inappropriate

Visit with the EAP to discuss your observations and the history of problems occurring within your work unit. There are many ways to approach diversity issues and inappropriate race-related remarks that surface between groups. Context and history are important. Not every problem requires a training or seminar solution. Sometimes the best intervention racial remark recently. Should I schedule diversity awareness training, or will this make things worse?

is a direct, zero-tolerance approach by management to address inappropriate behavior exhibited by certain employees. It is important to hold employees accountable and act quickly to discourage anything less than a respectful workplace. Helpful strategies for dealing with this situation may include: 1) Supervisor referral to the EAP of individual employees based on job performance concerns. 2) Mediation of groups of employees. This process may also reveal and help resolve some underlying issues. 3) A workshop dealing with issues of respect, tolerance and civility in the workplace with a presentation from an HR representative that outlines your agency policies and procedures for reporting incidents. This will send a broader message covering employees who feel disrespected.

■ I had a meeting to discuss my employee's tardiness. She said personal issues with her husband were to blame, but she was getting counseling. I decided against a supervisor referral at that point. She's doing great now, but should I have referred her to the EAP?

You could have made a supervisor referral, even though your employee had other plans. Regardless, your employee's tardiness has stopped. That means your corrective interview with her was successful. EAP referral is not a required way to solve a personal problem. It's not a replacement for community resources that employees may wish to use. Your employee had a plan for correcting her tardiness—getting counseling. Hopefully, the issue of her tardiness has been resolved. From the organization's viewpoint, that's the bottom line. If your employee starts coming to work late again, then you should pick up your discussion where you left off and make the supervisor referral, even if your employee claims to have another plan. This time your employee will have the EAP perspective from a professional with an accurate understanding of the employment issues, an impartial assessment of the right intervention, motivational counseling, appropriate communication with you, and follow-up.

■ My employee has offered pretty lame excuses for failing to complete three training courses this year. I wrote a letter and let him read it, with the idea of placing it in his file if he received another "incomplete." It worked! Was this better than an EAP referral?

The purpose of a supervisor referral is to help an employee improve performance when you are unable to make those corrections in the normal supervisor discourse. Your approach obviously created a strong sense of urgency—enough for your employee to overcome whatever contributed to his inability or unwillingness to complete training. No one knows what issues originally interfered with his ability to complete training, so we can't say for certain that your method was "better" than an EAP referral. For now, however, the pattern has stopped. The EAP is still available as a future resource for him as well as for you should the problem re-surface.

NOTES